Copyright © 2020 InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, a System1 Company This is the latest article in Health's column, But Why? Here experts decipher the most confusing psychological reasons for the mysteries of human behavior. Horror movies are scary. they are egregious . And yet, for most of us, they have a blast to watch - the best way to spend a Friday night, especially in October, when ghosts, graves, and makaber rule the moon. Take that first season, the 2017 adaptation of Stephen King's nightmare stuff novel, as proof: the film made more than $700 million at the box office worldwide. In other words, moviegoers flock to theaters by choosing to see a killer clown assassinate a bunch of kids. (Passing popcorn: Pennywise about tearing off Georgie's tiny arm!) Then what does he give? Why do so many of us get out of our way and even make good money to consume scary entertainment? Here's what experts have to say. Even if horror movies are fake, watching them can start a very real fight or flight response, some experts say. The brain doesn't always make a difference between phanties. Entirely effectively, Christa Jordan, PhD, a clinical psychologist based in Austin, Texas, tells Health. For example, get someone to describe biting in lemon, and if the person is really good at describing it, your saliva vessels will be activated. The type of brain at that moment forgets that what it sees is not a real danger and then recharges the physiological response that, if appropriate, he says, in turn, your body goes into combat or flight mode, which means it's flooded with adrenaline and euphoria caused by brain chemicals like endorphins and dopamine - all of which can pump you up and you feel that You're ready to take on the world (or at least Michael Myers). You may get a rush of adrenaline from screening a horror movie, but you're actually not in any danger when you're watching, say, purge—that's another huge part of the genre's appeal. You see scary things in a controlled environment, and I think that's what we're all looking forward to, explains Margot Levine, PhD, a New York City-based clinical psychologist, to Health: One of the things they like to do is escape from parenthood, reaching a certain point where it's a bit scary, And then go back. It's about playing with danger but with a sense of security. Despite the absence of any real threat, many people still feel successful when they finish a horror movie. You feel like, I was dealing with something that was outside my comfort zone, and I conquered it, Jeffrey Garder, PhD, a clinical psychologist based in New York City, tells Health. It gives you related confidence: Why do some people refuse to wear face masks on people? Horror movies give you a glimpse at how life-threatening situations may play out, which can make you feel more prepared for real danger. It's about trying to learn to predict the world around you, Coltan Scrivener, a PhD candidate in the University of Chicago's Department of Comparative Human Development, tells Health. What do other people do when they find themselves faced with some kind of particular threat or challenge? said Garder, who admits he has a fascination with zombie panic, and he explains it this way: There's a small part of me that believes that at some point there may be side effects of some drugs that are not going to bring the dead to life, but this may really affect the gyzamani lobe of the forehead or something, and people can. Behave in ways that can be very dangerous, he says. By watching shows like The Walking Dead, Gardere can get close what might happen if his worst nightmare becomes a reality—and it's not just the zombies he's taking on notes. As a psychologist, I watch a show like The Walking Dead to see how Behave in the zombie apocalypse, how they become real monsters, he says. Zombies are nothing more than window dressing in addition to giving you a playbook of sorts, experts say watching horror movies can help you practice coping strategies. I think people who watch them a lot learn how to deal with uncertainty and suspense and anxiety, Scrivener says, recently co-authoring a study that shows horror advocates are more resilient and less psychologically distracted than non-horror fans versus today's covid-19 pandemic—most likely because of their well-honed coping skills. We think what's going on is that panic fans are basically building a toolbox for how to deal with feelings of anxiety or fear, Scravener says, because that's exactly what you do when you're watching a horror movie. You adjust your feelings in a way that is put in the sweet spot for feeling scared but also fun. We all have uninsured parts of ourselves that I think are somehow foreign in the dangers outside of us, says Erin Hadley, PhD, a clinical psychologist in Philadelphia, who tells Health. With movies like Carrie's, for example, many people identify her by bullying and punishing her at school and at home, she says, but you then root out to slaughter her classmates? I think a lot of people do. Identifying with the perpetrator is a classic Freudian interpretation [of why we like horror], Jordan adds. That's why Freud said we'd like to watch boxing: we don't identify by hitting the person; we're identifying with someone who beats that nonsense from the other one I think a lot of people fighting to admit that, but the truth is, I think it's probably going on at some level, Freud says. By watching victims in horror movies make obvious mistakes like the old chestnut back at home — you'll be able to convince yourself that, if presented with the same situation, you'd be able to survive. Jordan says, There's always one of those scenes where the victim manages to disable the perpetrator and then starts walking really slowly and turning their backs. : Fun of it. I think there's that part of us trying to say, This is never going to happen to me, Jordan explains. Here are all the ways I answer differently, for example, you better hide, think faster, and never, ever travel while running in the woods. It's kind of like if you read an article in the newspaper about someone at Jeremy who happened at 4.30am and you say to yourself, this never happens to me because I'll never be at 4.30am on Levine says. This is magical thinking. This is how we separate ourselves from our fear of the terrible things that happen to us. Please try again.
